Knoll, Inc

Knoll

Tracy D. Wymer, Vice President Workplace leads an investigative workplace team focused on client product applications. The work, in concert with Knoll Workplace Research team, focuses on the study of the workplace, understanding trends in the emerging workforce and the ability to translate those needs into specific plans and product applications. The approach specializes in discovering links between real estate strategies, theory, and practice. The emphasis is on understanding workplace performance goals and meeting them through tangible products, resources and information. Tracy is also a member of the Knoll product development team and oversees technical and media teams that provide specification, product, rendering and multimedia support for Knoll customers.

Tracy joined Knoll in 2002. Prior to Knoll he managed the Bay Area office of SPACE, a workplace strategy based interior architecture firm, and spent 13 years at Bundy & White, a firm he co-founded. There he advised Fortune 500 and startup companies on product design, packaging, user interface, exhibit design, brand identity and the adaptive workplace. He also served as the Director of Industrial Design at the Academy of Art University (San Francisco) and taught an urban experience course at Stanford University (Palo Alto). Tracy earned a B.S. in Industrial Design from the University of Cincinnati and began graduate studies at San Francisco State.

Tracy is an urban cyclist, former little league coach, competitively sailed classic wooden boats on San Francisco Bay, and was a former professional chef. Current activities center around his sixteen year old twins. He lives in San Francisco.
